Aid to 'Foreign Policy'

The Carnegie Foundation announced yesterday that it will become associated with Foreign Policy magazine in several aspects of the publication's future production, development and growth.

Through the foundation's Endowment for International Peace, up to $55,000 per year will be available to the magazine over the next two years. Editorial and publishing responsibilities will continue to rest in the hands of the magazine's two co-editors, Warren Demian Manshel and Samuel P. Huntington. The magazine will occupy editorial facilities in the endowment's New York and Washington offices.

"It's not necessarily the money that counts here," said Robert C. Richter, assistant to the president of the endowment. "What's important is the contacts the endowment has made over the years with authorities in international law and international organization."

Foreign Policy has become a widely read and debated journal after publication of just five issues. Its 30-year-old managing editor, John Franklin Campbell, author of "The Foreign Affairs Fudge Factory," died recently.
